FROM THE EDITOR

Dear Reader,

The subject of leadership is perhaps one of the most important and compelling topics of study for military practitioners and scholars alike. The efficacy of the military depends precisely on the strength of the bond between leaders and followers. The fact that these roles are functionally interdependent assumes any conclusions and recommendations about one is incomplete without considerations of the other.

This dedicated issue of Air & Space Operations Review (ASOR) provides current analyses of the scholarship on leadership and followership, specifically on toxic examples of both. Bringing in research on toxic leaders, toxic followers, and organizational culture, both in and outside the military, the authors offer contributions to the literature, furthering the collective study of this critical topic.

I would like to thank the guest editors, particularly Dan Connelly, for their months of detailed work bringing this dedicated issue of the journal to fruition. Team ASOR appreciates Dan's endless patience with the deadlines and the editing process. We are pleased and privileged to help highlight and promote research on toxic leading, toxic following, and the role of organizational culture in the same.

~The Editor

Disclaimer and Copyright

The views and opinions in Air & Space Operations Review (ASOR) are those of the authors and are not officially sanctioned by any agency or department of the US government. This document and trademark(s) contained herein are protected by law and provided for noncommercial use only. Any reproduction is subject to the Copyright Act of 1976 and applicable treaties of the United States. The authors retain all rights granted under 17 U.S.C. §106. Any reproduction requires author permission and a standard source credit line. Contact the ASOR editor for assistance: asor@au.af.edu.